The paper highlights the recognition of humanitarian protection for environmental migrants, taking into account the ordinance n. 5022/2021 of the Italian Court of Cassation. In particular, the article analyzes the environmental migrants' situation in the international legal order and their lack of protection according to the international protection rules. It focuses on the Human Rights Committee decision in the Teitiota case and its influence for national judges as a possible way for international law of human rights to give protection to all individuals who are obliged to leave their countries as consequence of natural disasters.
